

Barely exceeding your average market stand height, SHELTER sits in the center of the Binnenrotte. Considering its width of seven meters and lengths of 30 meters, it's presence on the square is remarkably humble. The figure embodies a meter-high solid volume levitating at eye-level, impeding ones horizontal view, though not obstructing the spatial awareness of the square. The contour of the free form suggests direction - it is shaped to follow the longitudinal and transverse orientation of the busy square. A similar free form, though slightly shifted, determines the outline of an excavated space 80cm below ground. A space defined not by the extrusion of the vertical, but rather the manipulation of the horizontal plane. The steepness of the steps into the space varies, encouraging entry from the quiet side of the square. The shape's slab edge works in a similar matter - shaped either steep and wide or elegant, thin and welcoming. The interior space, though open on all sides, feels intimate. Slender, circular steel columns are situated freely under the mass, deviding the large space into two. Being off ground-level – away from the busy square and out of sight – brings a sense of privacy and seclusion. Furthermore, the shelter from the downpour or summer heat provides a welcome refuge in the public domain.
